Women Fishers in Community Managed Fisheries in Sekong River Basin

1. Background & Introduction

IUCN Laos held a one-day workshop in Attapeu, Southern Lao PDR, on 7 February 2013. The participants included women fishers from six villages, officials from local authorities and other stakeholders. The objective of the workshop was to deliberate upon the initial findings of a study to assess the status of women fishers in community based fisheries management and, through the process, raise awareness and promote women's participation in village-based fisheries management committees.

This activity was carried out in the backdrop of a US$ 26 million World Bank funded project being implemented by the Lao PDR Ministry of National Resources and Environment (MONRE). Under this project, the Ministry is in the process of developing pilot sites for village-based fisheries management committees in the Sekong Basin. Therefore, this activity aimed at contributing towards generating a better understanding of the opportunities and challenges associated with enhancing the capacity of the women fishers to effectively participate in the management of the proposed fisheries committees being formed on the Sekong River in 2013. Women's participation in these management processes will ensure integration of women's perspectives and the safeguarding of their interests as women play an important role in fisheries related activities in the Sekong Basin.

The workshop was jointly supported by a grant from CGIAR's Challenge Program on Water & Food-Mekong (CPWF) and the Mekong Water Dialogue, funded by the Government of Finland. This workshop was part of the study visit to Sekong villages where independent researcher, Charlotte Moser from IUCN's Commission on Ecosystem Management, conducted field a study through focus group discussions with more than 60 women fishers. IUCN's role was to design, organise, and facilitate the workshop as a part of the overall study.

This workshop was planned and executed using the lessons learnt, tools and capacity acquired through the Mekong Water Dialogue (MWD) project and following the research outline from Ms. Moser. The workshop built on the prior work carried out by IUCN Laos in January 2012 focused on women's groups and their traditional use of natural resources in Beung Kiat Ngong, Champassak Province.

2. The Process

For the field study, considering the objectives and in consultation with the researcher, IUCN identified six fishing villages on the Sekong River and its tributary, the Xekaman River, in Attapeu Province. These villages were chosen so that comparisons could be made between village fishery management committees. Hence, of the six villages selected, four villages had Fish Conservation Zones (FCZ) on the rivers and two villages were without FCZs. Further, three of the villages—Ban Hom, Ban Saphaothong, Ban Sokkham—were located in Samakhyxay District; and the other three—Ban Xaysy, Ban Sakhae, and Ban Vaththad—were located in Xaysedtha Districts.

IUCN's field-based Lao team, led by Mr. Vilavong Vannalath, field coordinator of IUCN's Mekong Water Dialogues initiative, worked with the Attapeu Provincial Office of Natural Resources & Environment (PONRE) and with district officials to obtain the required paperwork to permit the village study to take place, and to allow selected focus group members to participate in the IUCN workshop on February 7. Prior to the focus group discussions, district officials travelled to participating villages to obtain commitment from village chiefs to assemble focus groups of between 6-12 women fishers on designated days to participate in the study.

Site Visits

The study team visited two villages per day over a three-day period during February 4-6. The team consisted of Charlotte Moser; Viengxay Xaydara, translator and research assistant; Vilavong Vannalath, IUCN; and a representative of PONRE. Focus groups were held at all the villages and were participated in by village representatives from the Lao Women's Union, district representatives, and village chiefs. During the second part of the discussions, men and women were divided into separate groups to gather gender-specific input on fisheries related matters. A total of 66 women and 61 men participated in the 2-3 hour village meetings and focus groups.

Number of participants in Village

Almost 70 women fishers participated in village focus groups.

From each village, three persons — two women fishers and the village chief — who participated in the village focus group discussions were invited to attend the full-day workshop on 7 February 2013. IUCN obtained the necessary letters of invitation to allow the villagers to participate in the workshop, including per diems for their participation.

3. The Workshop

IUCN coordinated and facilitated the full-day workshop in the Provincial Meeting Room, at the Governor's Office, Attapeu. Thirty nine people (annex-I) attended the workshop, including 24 villagers from the six study villages. Invited guests were Mr. Navarath NOUANTHONG, Deputy Director, Attapeu Provincial Office of Natural Resources & Environment (PONRE); Mr. Sengphachanh, Deputy Attapeu Provincial Office of Livestock & Fisheries; Mrs Soulichanh VISETH, Lao Women's Union, Attapeu Province; Mrs. Douangmixay SITHTHAPASUTH, Lao

Women's Union, Samakhixay District; and researchers from the Lao National University, Prof. Damdouane Khouangvichit, Prof. John W. Pilgrim, and Associate Prof. Sackmone Sirisack.

The workshop (agenda; annex-II) began with a keynote address by Mr. Nouanthong that emphasized the importance of women fishers' participation in fishery management. This was followed by presentations by Ali Raza, Programme Manager, Southeast Asia IUCN, who introduced the audience to IUCN and gave an overview of its work in Laos; Vilavong Vannalath, presenting the background of IUCN's involvement with the Sekong River Basin; and Charlotte Moser, who discussed preliminary findings from the village focus groups (presentations; annex-III).

Mr. Nouanthon, Deputy Director of Attapeu PONRE, spoke about the importance of women fishers in fishery management.

After the morning coffee break, workshop participants were divided into two groups for group work. One group consisted of women fishers and the other group comprised village chiefs and provincial/district authorities. Both the groups discussed the issues pertaining to the active participation of women fishers in village fishery management committees; and gave suggestions about what changes could take place to bridge these gaps. The outcome of the group work was written in Lao on flipcharts by the workshop facilitators, who also served as translators.

Identified Gaps and Bridges

The workshop reconvened after lunch to present outcomes from the brainstorming sessions. Recognizing that women may defer to the opinions of village chiefs and provincial authorities, the women's group was invited to lead off the presentations.

Gaps identified by the women were:

- Women participate less in decision-making in fishery management at the village level.
- Village authorities give less consideration to the importance of women's work in fishery management.

- Village authorities do not understand how women feel about being excluded from decision-making.
- Women lack confidence in expressing their opinions in front of men.
- Women are concerned by the deteriorating water quality of the rivers.

Suggestions to bridge these gaps were:

- Women need to be more committed about sharing their ideas in fishery management.
- Village authorities need to recognize the importance of women's work in fishery management.
- Women need training in how to be leaders.
- They also need training in financial management and alternative livelihood skills such as agriculture and handicrafts.
- District officials should organize village-level meetings to discuss gender empowerment. If village women tried to call such a meeting, men would not attend.
- A women's discussion group should be organized to select candidates for future village chiefs.
- Mining activity along the river must be banned because it is damaging the river water and reducing the number and quality of fish.
- Trees must not be cut on the river's main stream.
- A water purification system must be implemented for the river.

Women fishers ended their presentation with a song, "Beautiful Attapeu"

Provincial/district authorities and village chiefs then presented what they discussed were gaps in encouraging women to participate in fisheries management. They were:

- Acknowledging that governance is weak in responding to the importance of women's work in fishery management;
- Recognizing that women do not actively participate in fishery management decisions.
- Weak communication in informing women about fishery management issues.
- Lack of understanding by women about the rules and regulations of fishery management

Village chiefs presented gaps and bridges.

Suggestions to bridge these gaps were:

- Give women the right to become involved with fishery management.
- Improve education and training for women.
- Involve women in decision-making about fishery management.

Provincial/district authorities and village chiefs also recommended that villages consider women as candidates for village chief; that fishery management adhering to rules and regulations be strengthened; and that village cluster meetings be used to discuss and resolve fishery management issues.

While making concluding remarks, the Deputy Director PONRE shared that the workshop had been very useful and the active participation by the women was a very good sign. He said that the gaps identified during the workshop and the ensuing discussions helped him in having a better understanding of the issues pertaining to enhancing women participation in fisheries management at the village level. He ensured that all possible steps would be taken in this connection. He also invited IUCN to start working in Attapeu in collaboration with PONRE.

4. The Way Forward

There were some immediate positive outcomes of the workshop. The workshop in itself gave exposure to women who had, for the first time, attended such a workshop where high government officials were also present. They felt confident and shared that they would proactively participate in village consultations in the future.

On the other hand, the senior officials had a firsthand experience of listening to some very articulate women openly sharing that they had never been consulted in village development and fisheries related decision making in their villages.

The study, to be finalised later by the researcher, will be shared with the stakeholders through a study report.

It is anticipated that the learning and outcome of this initiative would also contribute towards inclusive action planning to better integrate women's participation into the Mekong Water Dialogues and 3S initiatives as well as into overall natural resource management programming.

The identified gaps will be addressed through further capacity building programmes in collaboration with local authorities and non-governmental organisations operational in the area.

The Lao Women Association (LWA) has been playing a critical role in women's empowerment at the village level. It is important to collaborate with LWA to better its understanding and the capacity of its staff with respect to fisheries' management and the associated women's role. This would help in developing an effective and efficient outreach system to increase women's participation in fisheries through an already established mechanism in the country.

IUCN and CPWF should explore the possibilities of enhancing collaboration and taking forward this pilot study in other villages in the Sekong Basin to facilitate participation of women in the proposed village-based fisheries management committees in the Sekong Basin being set up in 2013.

Women Fishers in Sekong Basin

75 women who fish on Sekong and Xekaman Rivers, ponds, streams, and rice paddies.

Assist husbands fishing with gill nets from boats

'Women's work' fishing with scoop nets in ponds, streams, paddies

Lesson Learned:

Deteriorating water quality of the river is impacting how women fishers are participating in management of community fishing

With fewer large fish in the river, women spend more time fishing—with or without their husbands—for smaller, often inferior fish to feed their families.

Lesson Learned

Scouring for small fish and aquatic life in ponds, streams and, during the rainy season, in rice paddies to sustain their families is almost exclusively considered “women’s work.”

Lesson Learned

Women are often exclusively responsible for selling the best fish at local markets. This expands financial responsibilities—and opportunities—for women.

Lesson Learned

Three out of six villages had no operational fishing management committee. Women served on two village committees—and one village committee had 3 women.

Lesson Learned

- The Lao Women's Union plays a critical role in raising awareness about the participation of women in Sekong fishing villages
- Environmental development in the Sekong is contributing to social change in the fishing villages.

Thank you !
